THE AMERICAN VICTORIES BEFORE MANILA.

By GEO. C. CRAIG, Sydney, Australia.

THE day's objective was Nevalicken and Malabon, the two keys of the rebel position commanding the railway and the advance of General McArthur's brigades of Hale, Hall, Wheaton and Otis, on the northwest of Caloocan and the waterworks. The Filipino force was estimated at 12,000 men. All was ready long before daylight on the 25th of March. The four brigades were in position to begin the day's work. So far in the grey dawn the rebel chiefs had not anticipated the American rush. But our brave kindred had a stiff and dangerous task before them, and many a thought must have been cast over the Pacific towards those States which gave them birth and endearment. All stood there in the lines before Caloocan with that heroic ardor so openly displayed under the attacks of Lee and Grant, Longstreet and Sheridan, when the South was against the North; but now they stood in line as comrades, as one grand united army confronting the foes of their country, not in Mexico or Cuba, but in the far-off Philippines, and the Orient of the East. The men knew that the rebellion must be put down, and that there must be no advance followed by retirements. The Filipinos had found a tougher foe than they expected. The situation in Manila city was quiet the night before. The operations were far from the city limits. The firing could not be heard. The old battle lines in front of the city were firmly held, and could not be uncovered by the foe. The scenes of battle may be traced along the railway line north of Malabon and Polo.

In these first operations against the rebel lines the direction of the American Staff showed a want of intimate knowledge of the ground in the theatre of war, of how to act in skirmishing and battle firing against vendetta warfare, and more cohesion in battle discipline. The troops fought under the strains of heavy marching, excessive night duty, the want of more cavalry and 15-pounder guns, for the sake of moral effect, and to smash the foe out of their trenches in the scrubs. Moral effect has advantages generally upon an enemy, especially if it is Asiatic and half savage. In the recent wars the moral effect of a large proportion of horsemen and machine guns produced great moral advantages. The ordinary drill-book tactics should be forgotten in cases where the assaulter has to alter his tactics to counteract and defeat those of the enemy. The American scouts are good against Red Indians, but not against Filipinos in the Philippines. General Otis had not numbers to make more use of the golden modern rule—not to attack a position in front without supporting it on one or both flanks against the foe, to cut him off, and threaten his line of retreat.

DESTRUCTION OF MALABON.

Before Aguinaldo evacuated his old headquarters at Malabon, to the entrenchments of which he clung with soldierly ambition, he set it on fire that night. Its flames lit up the country for miles, and though General McArthur was anxious to save the town for the sake of the inhabitants, his Brigadier, Wheaton, posted with his troops along the railway line, could then render no assistance to save it. Late in the afternoon, whilst Polo was being stormed, the gunboats up the creeks managed to bombard the town, rendering it untenable. The rebels managed to get away most of their arms, stores and war material to Malolos, where the rebel leader now fixed his headquarters and government, 28 miles from Manila, further along the railway. It was from Malabon that the rebels had delivered all their blows against the Spanish army, and carried on their insurgent government. The Spanish generals tried in vain to penetrate the lines, as McArthur's brigades did, but the backwoodsmen of Dakota and Kansas followed up their "trail" amongst these hills and covered trenches in a way that surprised them. The rebels had also found out that the Mauser rifle in their hands was of longer range than the Springfield rifle in the hands of the dashing volunteers of Brigadiers Hale and Hall, and were able to open fire sooner than the stormers in line. It was the fate of the German needle-guns against the longer ranged French rifle in the Franco-German War of 1870-71. But Otis had no guns to form or place massed artillery in line to make up for effective rifle fire. The brave volunteers have since been armed with the more deadly and longer ranged Krag-Jorgensen. The rebels set all the large buildings and rice mills on fire, leaving only the stone Catholic Church standing. The people fled in a hurry, taking everything with them to the hills, and many of the rebel soldiers took refuge in Navatos and Cusag, but they ultimately surrendered as they were driven out by the naval guns of the "Helena," "Callao," "Ningdepan," and "Laguna." The burning of Malabon was complete. The scene of war by midnight was terrible, as the Americans encamped along the Talighan River. Wheaton held the field from the line of railway to that river, and as the bridge was destroyed he had to keep up a continuous fire in reply to the "sniping" and volleys from the opposite side. The men had little rest, as the rough ground traversed, the sun heat endured, and the repeated combats had knocked them up. Several times the rebels left their trenches and charged the Oregons, drove them back, but the Oregons, being re-enforced, returned to the attack and finally drove them into Malabon.

PASSAGE OF THE TALIGHAN.

The next day's fighting was also heavy and of the most desperate description. The passage of a river is often a dangerous move in the face of the enemy. The engineers set to work to repair the blown up bridge, with new flooring and some beams, over which a transport wagon or a field-gun could be carried. Beyond the river were the villages of Malinta and Magcanya, the next military objective. The operations promised to be very stiff, but General McArthur determined to advance and capture the positions, giving them no time to rally, for the rebel tactics were indeed—

"He who fights, and runs away,
Will live to fight another day."

COLONEL THEODORE F. HOFFMAN,
Commanding 8th Infantry

Our State Army and Navy

The Washington, Oregon, and Kansas troops were to lead the advance. The banks of the river were covered by a block-house, of Spanish design, and a series of entrenchments, well garrisoned. Brigadier Wheaton got some of his men across the river during the night, half a mile south of the railway, near Oagapon. The Americans numbered 3000 for the passage of the river and the attack upon Malinta. Brigadiers Otis and Hale fronted Magcanya, and Wheaton Malinta. By a ruse, the Oregons managed to cross on the left, and the 22d U. S. on the right, supported by four companies of the hard fighting 23d Infantry. This was effected with a wild cheer. Once over the United States troops had to cross a clear half mile of open space, and in rushing they lost severely. A crest or ridge had to be seized before dealing with the village of Malinta, so strongly fortified. Magcanya was fortified by trenches, with intervals of 300 yards between small forts. All looked so quiet in the rebel lines that they thought the place was deserted. But a trap was laid for Wheaton's troops by the cunning Filipinos. The Washingtons skirmished cautiously through some long grass. The Brigadier and Staff directed them under a severe fire. By steady advancing, good firing and leading, the rebels failed to stop their charges. On the "Yankees" went with ardor and heroic fortitude. Nothing daunted them in the shape of fire. Grey headed heroes of 1864, and the Indian fights, led them as of old, just as if they had the Sioux or Sitting Bull camp in front of them. The fire raged for some time, but the Americans, without the slightest signs of "funk" went at their foe in daring style, and by 1 p. m. Malinta was captured by the advance guards. McArthur soon joined them with the main force of his division from Novalicher and Polo. The G. O. C. resolved not to enter the burning town of Malabon, but next day he ordered the readvance upon the railway line in the direction of Malolos, where Aguinaldo was again reported to be strongly entrenched with his rallied army. The American loss on the 26th was 45 killed and wounded.

THE ADVANCE UPON MARILAO.

General McArthur, with his cavalry as scouts, made a careful reconnaissance of the bush and hills along the road to Malolos. The scouting was superb, and he soon found out the true position of Aguinaldo in the bush land. He gradually pushed forward next day, and drove in the rebel pickets, capturing many prisoners. Thirty villages lay between McArthur's front and Malolos, with the rebels holding strong positions at Bulacar and Guiz, and these were first to be attacked. During this advance an incident occurred at Pasig, held by some Washington volunteers. A large crowd of Filipinos collected in a store-house, with the French flag flying. A short, sharp, and gallant fight took place near it. Whilst some men replied to the rebel shooting, a forlorn hope advanced to set the store-house on fire. They did so. The Washingtons in force advanced, when suddenly the rebels appeared on a burning balcony, and fired a volley. The Filipinos seeing it was no use fighting further, began to retreat towards Malolos. A thousand rebels covered their retreat by making a strong stand behind their trenches at Marilao, over the river at that name. In this affair 6 Americans were killed, 2 officers and 40 men were wounded. This event completely cut off Aguinaldo's supply of ammunition from the South, but still he fought hard to stop the advance upon Malolos in the North. McArthur was now three miles beyond Polo, nine miles from Manila, and 15 miles from Malolos. The line of fight had been along the railway line, and the G. O. C., like Kitchener, used the captured cars for troops and stores to the best advantage. The men's legs were saved by railway transport, until the staff officers began to feel the presence of a new series of redoubts, and long lines of trenches. The troops were reformed in lines of battle once more, to indulge in the driving out process in the advance, and assault. McArthur captured Marilao in clever style, but the fight had been pretty severe all day, forty men being killed and wounded. Aguinaldo commanded his troops in person. The three days fighting had cost the Americans 30 killed and 215 wounded. The South Dakotas, the Oregons, and Kansans, bore the brunt of the battle, yet all battalions showed how eager they were to be in the several trenches first. The Dakotas made splendid charges, with only the Springfield rifle, dislodging the yellow rebels from behind their sand-bag batteries and bamboo ambushes. When the enemy bolted out of Marilao, the Dakotas rushed to the highest house, and "high above the topmost roof the banner of the United States flew." The cavalry went in pursuit, killed a hundred rebels and captured several hundreds. Aguinaldo had 5000 men with him; the Dakotas had 10 killed, in fact the Dakotas "won the day."

THE STRUGGLE FOR MALOLOS.

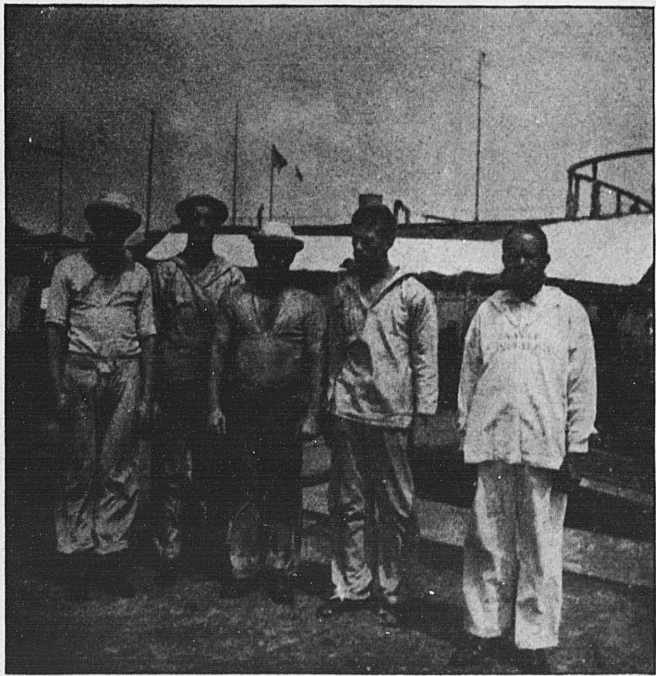

The capture of Malolos was not done without a stern combat. At 6 a. m., McArthur again sounded the advance like a Bindon Blood and Lockhart, always going straight at the foe, with much skill and devoted valor, in Bocara and Bigaa—7 miles from Malolos. Along the railway line the landscape was a country village, rice and cane fields, mixed with dense scrub. As Aguinaldo retreated he destroyed many villages, the railway and telegraph lines, which, however, were speedily reconstructed. The spirit and discipline of the young Americans during the week's severe fighting never degenerated, but marched with a firm step from victory to victory, all the more so, when the recent defeats of the rebels were sure to bring about the beginning of the end of the rebellion. The Bocara bridge, being unbroken, largely contributed to the speedy capture of that place. American re-enforcements continuing to arrive made a deep impression upon the rebel staff, and whilst McArthur was within gunshot of Malolos, Aguinaldo was sending his headquarters to be fixed at San Fernando, ten miles further away. In the afternoon of the 28th March, the General left Bigaa for Guiguinto, and soon the fierce and desperate field entrenched battles began. McArthur arriving at the latter place at 5 p. m., with the loss of 70 men killed and wounded. The river was crossed upon pontoons under fire, and the artillery guns were passed over the bridge at Guiguinto by hand, the mules of the batteries swimming the stream under a hot rebel Mauser fire. The main bodies of infantry were advanced over the railway into battle on the rebel side, nothing daunted by Aguinaldo disputing every inch of the way to Malolos. They had, by their forward movements, stopped the pot-shot firing into camps at night. The Americans carried their flags everywhere with them in the battle advance. The rebels were being forced back slowly and successfully, though they mustered in strong force at every point of defense, over broken and treacherous country, for 28 miles from Manila, all fortified with the art learned from the Spanish, as specially instanced near the large villages of Malinta and Marilao. Many a Dakota and Oregon man bit the dust before these towns in the desperate rushes to capture them. The South Dakotas and the 3d Artillery dismounted, and led by Colonel Frost, were everywhere in the front rank before Malolos, and repulsed the Filipino army with great slaughter in the trenches, but with the loss of 3 officers and 4 men killed, and one officer and 22 men wounded. The destruction of the railway by Aguinaldo greatly impeded McArthur's advance, yet it was wonderful to see how the United States Engineers speedily repaired it, enabling the General in the advance to go forward in the fray. The "army" gunboats on the Balacan River followed the General's operations, and greatly covered McArthur's advance. The rebel general burned the towns and villages as he retreated. It was a scene of great conflagration—it was war in its worst form. The 23d Infantry had done so much fighting that it was recalled from the front, and replaced by the 3d Infantry. The grand charge of the South Dakotas and 3d (dismounted) Artillery will never be forgotten. They charged across the open east from the railway to the edge of the jungle, filled with a strong force of Filipinos, and bayoneted them. The total day's loss was 10 killed and 60 wounded. Aguinaldo upon being so well defeated, fled with his troops to San Fernando. At the close of the battle, General Garcia, a native Filipino leader, with 1000 native riflemen and 4000 "Bolomen," camped on the Marilao River, in the rear of McArthur, to help that general in the defeat of the Filipino army. Evidently the natives, like all Orientals, believe in being "on the side of the heaviest battalion." The gallantry of the Filipinos had won the respect of the brave Americans, indeed, "their fighting capacity astonished everybody." During February and March the American loss numbered 157 men killed and 864 wounded. Once or twice General Otis's Brigadiers had to fall back upon their previous camps, as our brigades had to do on the Indian frontier. American officers in the hilly warfare along the northern railway line from Manila should remember Colonel Neville's remark: "After any naturally strong position has been captured, it should, if possible, be held; but if it is found necessary to withdraw the victorious troops, for want of water or other reasons, it is desirable to do so to the front, i. e., in the direction of the enemy's retreat." The reason for this is that a savage foe regards any retirement as a sign of weakness, and the foe in their ignorance is apt to attack rear guards and reoccupy their lost positions, and a new fight in the morning, with all its losses, has to be repeated, as at Dargai and several times beyond Manila.

MODE OF WARFARE.

General Otis's reorganized army began its general advance to crush the army of Aguinaldo, and stamp out the insurrection, by the 25th of March. The previous battle had not exhausted the power of the Talagos, nor broken the Filipinos mobilization enough to make them sue for peace. They had evaded meeting the Americans in the open field in large force up to March 17th. They were known to be concentrating around Malolos, along the Northern railway line, behind trenches and block houses in the bush, and edge of woods where their range of fire could tell heavily on the rushing Americans. As they were driven by the heroic Generals McArthur, Hall, Hale, Wheaton, and Otis—not the G. O. C.—from trench to trench, they presented great rallying power behind their fresh lines of trenches and secret jungle paths. The "Yankees" were under fire day and night, like the troops of Lockhart and Bindon Blood in India. Aguinaldo was reported to have 30,000 riflemen in his ranks, and 30,000 other men armed in a variety of ways. The theatre of war was rough country, so broken by gullies, hills, rice and cane fields, that was sure to impede the advance of Otis's troops, and delay them under a heavy fire. The rebels knew every rood of the ground, and expected that the Americans would rush over it headlong, which they did, but gallantly overcame all obstacles, and hostile fire. Aguinaldo had proclaimed war to the knife against "all foreigners," and stated to his men that the Filipinos of Mindora, Paney, and South Luzon were rushing to help them. The arrival of American re-enforcements had braced his generals and rebel army up to the highest pitch of ardor and resolution. Brigadier Otis received three light gun batteries and six Hotchkiss gun batteries, to be used as mountain artillery.

PLAN OF CAMPAIGN.

The American army force of cavalry, artillery and infantry, totalized about 42,000—a force quite sufficient, assisted by the ships of Admiral Dewey, to put down and smash Aguinaldo. General Otis's plan was to advance and cut the rebel army in two before they knew the object, as it would cut him off on land from South Luzon, confine him to Northern Luzon, where he hoped to capture Aguinaldo, his provisional government, and force his fighting army into unconditional surrender. For this purpose General Wheaton stood with his brigade in reserve on the 24th at Caloocan, Brigadiers Otis and Hale on the 23d, and Brigadier Hall on the 24th, at the Waterworks. Division-General McArthur was the "Archie" Hunter of the advance, the Westmacott of the battle, the Hector Macdonald of the fight. General Lawton was in charge of the southern operations if the Filipinos showed fight in or out of Manila. The G. O. C. had his headquarters near Manila, directing the operations a la Moltke, as he had not forgotten the bold and attempted burning of Manila and suburbs, part of the enemy's tactics and plans. The details of battle will show that General McArthur did cut the rebels in two, gained a succession of victories, which, however, were slightly indecisive. The rebels were driven back, but they again showed up strong in fresh concentrations, without capturing the Filipino Arabi Pasha. Otis had to employ all his forces, and conducted his operations upon a larger scale than before. His task was arduous and constant, each success being followed up by another battle, and the foe were savage and untractable. Otis's plan of battle was well thought out; the movements were generally made with smart precision; the positions had all to be taken with a rush, and General Wheaton, late in the day of the 2d, had a terrible hand to hand combat on the left of the advance, where an isolated regiment made a gap between his two wings. It will be seen that the Filipinos stood more on the offensive than they had hitherto done, frequently advancing to meet the yelling and heroic American advances. Aguinaldo's plan was to let his foe rush over the open country until well within range of his hidden trenchmen, and then let the Mauser rifles pelt them with lead and destructive effect. But as the Americans everywhere rushed forward with Redan and Dargai valor, the rebels bolted. It was grand to see how the young and hardy "Yankee" Volunteers charged up to the death-dealing entrenchments. Blood told when well led by brave and intelligent officers. The fights before Manila should give confidence to the Volunteer branch of the Australian defense forces—the P.P. regiments as well—all burning now to defeat Boers, or some possible invader.

The Anglo-Russian agreement is not going to stop the dangers of invasion, or sudden war. The Americans rushed over the zones of open fire with steady discipline and gallant manner, just as British and Indian troops have had to do upon so many recent occasions, with the heroic track of killed and wounded behind the attack. The Volunteer courage is indisputable. The price of victory proved to be heavy, but it is the price which great nations have to pay for the expansion of empire. Cuba was a walk-over, but a long and regular campaign had to be undertaken by the Americans in the Philippines.

In speaking of the "soldier bill," which he has introduced into Congress, Congressman Charles Dick, secretary of the National Republican Committee and former Colonel of the Eighth Ohio Regiment, said:

"I think every national guardsman in the country will favor it. The bill will increase the standing of the militia, while still allowing it to retain its individuality. If the new bill passes and becomes operative, the guards of the States will become nothing less than a reserve force to the regular army of the United States, thus giving the nation at one time an actual standing army of 125,000 able-bodied men.

"When our recent war closed from personal observations I thought improvements could be made in the State guards by national supervision. At first the plan seemed remote of success, but as national guardsmen became better acquainted with its provisions, its substantial qualities became more apparent and a general acquiescence came from all parts of the country."

COLONEL HENRY T. DECHERT, Second Infantry, and his court of inquiry, in the alleged mismanagement of the finances of the late Twentieth Infantry, have finished their work. While the evidence produced showed much loose management, it is a question whether there were any criminal acts committed by the accused. The parties involved at the starting of the Twentieth Regiment Fair had every opportunity of running the bazaar on a strictly business principle. Notwithstanding the many advices given by the better class of officers in the Regiment, these were utterly ignored. The "inactive" committee were entirely helpless to better the situation, hence the disastrous ending of the famous Twentieth.

THE Committee on War Claims, at Washington, through the investigation and report of a sub-committee, have decided to reimburse officers and men of the Ninth Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, who sustained a loss of their campaign equipments by a fire in a baggage car while enroute from Mt. Gretna to Chickamauga. The sum aggregates $5,963. Three of the captains who thus lost their belongings, died while in the service. These were Captain Dennison Sterns, Captain O. Hillard Bell, and Captain Darius L. Miers. The mortality of officers in Colonel Dougherty's command was greater than any other Pennsylvania Regiment. The amounts thus recovered will be paid the families of the deceased.

THE question of punishing delinquents throughout the several commands is causing the regimental and company commanders much worryment. Some field officers take the stand that courts of inquiry are a detriment to the service and prevents the enlistment of good men. This may be well enough in a sense, but "good men," as a rule, go into the National Guard organization fully conversant with the duties required, and are anxious to serve out their three years with honor.

There is, however, another class of men who frequently enlist in the service, and moved by a sudden impulse, soon tire of the discipline necessary for proper military establishment, and have little or no regard for the oath of allegiance they have taken. This class should be made to suffer the full penalty of the law and brought publicly before a delinquency court. It frequently happens, especially in the city regiments, that a man is discharged for dereliction of duty or unsoldierly conduct, and even the destruction and theft of State property, and is simply discharged from the regiment without honor. In two or three weeks' time, the same individual enlists in another regiment, and when meeting his former company commander, gives him the "Laugh."

The Editor, through the courtesy of Colonel Thurston, of New York, had the pleasure of attending one of their battalion courts. There were at least forty delinquents present from the regiment, and the fine imposed ranged from five to seventy dollars. In one case a man became defiant and refused to pay the fine and was committed to jail for five days. After his release, his employer paid the fine out of wages due him, with the understanding that if he failed to discharge his duty as a State soldier his position would be given another. This spirit should be emulated in Pennsylvania, and the officers would be much encouraged.

Personal Mention

The officers of the Third Infantry have presented to Colonel Ralston a testimonial of their thorough appreciation of his administration, and have tendered him the unanimous vote of the line for re-election. Colonel Ralston's time expired March 9th.

A good story is told of the First Troop during the Hazleton campaign. Through the courtesy of the railroad officials, they were permitted to sleep in the cars over night. Before settling down for their first night's rest, they were served with a ration which included hardtack. This had evidently been on hand some time, and was weevilly. The cars being but dimly lighted by a few candles, the condition of the biscuits was not discovered until the next day, when the second ration was served. It is said that there were many "funny mutterings."

While it has been stated that the First and Third Brigades would encamp at Mt. Gretna this summer, and the Second Brigade at Glencairn, it can safely be said that the coming encampment will be by division, and the chosen site will be Gettysburg. Many of the officers throughout the State are anxious to have their men encamp on this historic ground, believing that it will create great interests in the commands. It must be remembered that at least seventy-five per cent of the present establishment are new men, and it has been six years since Gettysburg was last visited by the Guard.

The popular and efficient inspector of the Third Brigade, Major William S. Millar, was wedded to Miss Harriet Clark, of New York City, on Tuesday, February 27th.

The majority of the line officers of the State Fencibles Battalion seem to favor the assignment to the Sixth, but, of course, desire the re-election of Major Brazer. Captain Lumb, who was formerly the Battalion Adjutant, now the Regimental Adjutant of the Sixth, has many warm supporters in this move and is untiring in his efforts to bring about the assignment.

It is stated that in the event of Battery "D's" muster-out, that Lieut. Maris would be a very acceptable candidate for First Lieutenant of Company "L," First Infantry.

Captain Schermerhorn and his troop tendered a reception and dinner to Captain Frank A. Edwards, U. S. Army, on March 10th, which was one of the leading military events of the season. Captain Edwards, for several years, was a military instructor at the Girard College, and it was solely through his efforts that a six company battalion of one hundred cadets each was formed. During the Spanish-American War, when a third call was imminent, the second troop, which was then an independent organization, tendered the position of captain to Captain Edwards. Being in the the regular establishment, it was impossible for him to accept a State commission. He, however, accepted the honorary commandership with the able assistance of Captain Richard Tilghman, formerly of the first troop, and in a remarkably short space of time, presented a troop of cavalry that was a credit to the State. Subsequently, the troop was mustered in the State service, and is now the junior organization of the squadron. Captain Jones, of the Sheridan troop, stationed at Tyrone, is the senior cavalry officer, and practically squadron commander.

Capt. Geo. C. Miller and Second Lieutenant Edwin F. Fry, Company "L," Second Infantry, have resigned.

Lieutenant and Battalion Adjutant Frank Afflerbach has been granted leave of absence from February 1st to May 1st, 1900, with permission to leave the State.

Corporal Frank Shakespeare, formerly of Company "C," of the Sixth Infantry, and late Sergeant of the First Regiment of Volunteer Engineers, will shortly be elected to the position of Second Lieutenant in Company "B" of the Sixth.

The anniversary entertainment of Company "E," of the Fourteenth Infantry, held on February 28th, was a very successful affair.

Battery "B" is again handicapped in its drill for want of space. The present quarters are entirely inadequate, and this simply demonstrates the necessity of a proper Armory in the city of Pittsburgh.

Within the past three months Colonel Rutledge's command has had many line changes, but it seems to be all for the best, as the regiment is in a very flourishing condition and the new officers are filling the positions very ably.

It is stated that Major Cuthbertson, of the Tenth Infantry, is a popular candidate for the Lieutenant Colonelcy of the regiment in the event of Colonel Barnett's advancement.

Plans have been submitted to the Board of Trustees for the completion of the Armory of the Second Regiment. A handsome stone front, three stories in height, will soon be erected, and the regiment will have one of the finest Armories in the State.

The Thirteenth Infantry will shortly have a fortress home which will eclipse anything in the State. Colonel Watres and his officers have been untiring in their efforts to properly house the command.

Second Lieutenant John G. Wiestling was elected captain of Company "C" of the Eighth Infantry, located at Chambersburg. He is a thoroughly up-to-date officer, and Company "C" should make a record for themselves under his administration.

Colonel Charles H. Howell, Division Staff, who has been in ill health for some time past, is sojourning at the Brighton Hotel, Atlantic City. The salt air seems to have greatly improved him.

The reinspection of the several companies who failed to pass on the original schedule, seem to be about a good-sized squad. It has been suggested that should the authorities decide to muster-out Battery "D," it would be well to transfer them as an entire organization, to take the place of one of the delinquent companies. The personnel of this command is most excellent, and a transfer of this kind will surely be appreciated by the regimental commander who is fortunate enough to get them.

Captain Louis Walters, of the Sixth Infantry, who is the senior captain of the State service, is mentioned as a possible candidate for Lt. Col. of Colonel Coryell's command.

Captain J. Howard Martz, Allentown, Pa., commanding Company "M," Seventh Infantry, which is the only detached company left in the eastern section of the State, is ready for muster-out. It is unfortunate that this company should be disbanded, as its personnel is very fine and its drill in a high state of efficiency. It was expected that Company "M" would be attached to the Fourth Infantry, but the authorities feel that Allentown cannot support more than two infantry companies. The Journal congratulates Captain Martz's command on the noble fight they made to be retained in the Guard.

The extreme drooping cap visor worn by most officers of the U. S. Army, and by many officers throughout the State, is simply an improvement over the original pattern. It is optional with the officers of the army to wear one of three patterns. The original pattern, which so much resembles that of the motorman's cap, has been discarded, and the medium and the extreme droop substituted.

Adjutant Howell, of the First Regiment, is a nephew of Colonel Charles H. Howell, Division Staff.

The regimental review and reception of the Third Infantry, held on the evening of Washington's Birthday, was in every way a success. The Governor's Staff was represented by Adjutant General Thomas J. Stewart and Colonel Thomas Potter, Jr. General Snowden and General John W. Schall, with their entire staffs, were present, General Snowden being the reviewing officer. Nearly every organization in the first brigade was represented.

Battalion Adjutant Frank Afflerbach is seriously ill in North Carolina, where he has gone for the benefit of his health.

Elections have been ordered in Company "A" for Captain, vice Chas. H. Speckman to Regimental Quartermaster, and such other vacancies as may occur.

We herewith present a form of a Corporal's report for each drill, which we think, if adopted, would prevent considerable "padding," and in this manner the average of attendance throughout the drill season might be made to count in the Inspector's report:
